About Conference

Coping with mental health during COVID-19 is crucial for the well-being of your loved ones. The stress brought on by an outbreak can lead to changes in sleeping and eating patterns, worsen existing mental health conditions, excessive overthinking, and difficulties in sleeping and concentrating. Sleep disorders can arise in individuals during an outbreak. The mental health of children, teens, adults, and older people may vary during this time. It is important to take care of yourself and your community in order to cope with stress disorders. There are many ways to cope with stress, such as taking breaks from watching, reading, and listening to news about the outbreak.
